Milk of a Lioness in Buddhist and Non-Buddhist Literatures

In the present lecture an attempt will be made to discuss the metaphor and simile of the milk of a lioness—that is, not those of a lion or lioness as such—as found mainly, but not exclusively, in Indian and Tibetan sources. A particular attempt will be made to be as comprehensive and representative as possible in the case of the occurrences and employments of this metaphor/simile in Tibetan literature, so as to gain as broad a picture as possible of the matter from both its diachronic and synchronic perspectives. Nonetheless, despite efforts to cover as many varieties of Tibetan literary genres as possible, owing to several factors, no claim of completeness can be made.
